As an integrated and balanced approach to development, social and solidarity economy (SSE) has the potential to function as an intelligent means of localizing the 2030 Agenda. But how well is it working, and what needs to be done to fulfil this potential?

At this side event, speakers will discuss new research evidence and local government experience of SSE, and the enabling conditions—such as institutional arrangements, political forces and economic possibilities—which are needed for it to succeed in diverse contexts, both in its own terms and as a means of realizing the 2030 Agenda’s vision of transformation, particularly at the local level and in cities.
